Abstract:
Various communication with each other through release of neurotransmitters by the process of exocytosis. These neurotransmitters are stored in vesicle vesicles (EV). Synaptic vesicles containing SNARE proteins (SNAP-25 and synapsin in SNARE) present on the pre-synaptic membrane forming the SNARE complex forming a transient structure during the membrane fusion called as fusion pore. Through this pore neurotransmitter release EV into the synaptic cleft. It is possible an abnormal pre-synaptic protein, as aggregated form causes abnormal dopamine release from pre-synaptic terminal which is the characteristic of Parkinson's disease. Interestingly the function of monoamine exocytosis is still not fully known. Understanding its normal function could shed light on how aggregated forms cause abnormal neurotransmitter release in Parkinson's disease. Our single molecule and ensemble measurements reveal a novel role of monoamine exocytosis in controlling fusion pore transition. Our study has far-reaching implication in understanding the molecular basis of observed vesicular secretion under pathological consequences.
